Southwestern College Professional Studies
Bachelor of Science with a Major in Human Resource Management and Development
Air University ABC

In an increasingly competitive environment, organizations must compete for resources that include human capital. Roles associated with human resource management and talent development have increased in importance in recent decades with some elevated to key strategic management functions. Those seeking a comprehensive and relevant foundation for a career in human resources have the opportunity in the Human Resource Management and Development (HRMD) program to integrate knowledge of contemporary theory, concepts, and practice, and develop relevant skills in demand by employers. The program provides knowledge and skills that encompass topics such as performance management, compensation and benefits, developing and recruiting workforce talent, human resource information systems and technologies, human resource analytics, ethical and legal issues in human resource management, and negotiation and conflict resolution. Empowered with success in the program and understanding the strategic importance of human resources to the organization, the HRMD graduate will be on the cutting edge and prepared for professional advancement in the field.
